Sarah Allen Gershon, an Associate Professor at Georgia State University, received her Ph.D. in Political Science from Arizona State University. Her research focuses primarily on the incorporation of traditionally underrepresented groups (including women, and racial and ethnic minorities) into the American political system. In seeking to explain the challenges faced by these groups, Dr. Gershon’s work emphasizes the role of communication, campaigns and political attitudes. Her work combines research from multiple fields and relies on a diverse set of methods, including content analysis, experimentation, surveys and in-depth interviews. Dr. Gershon’s research has been published in Political Research Quarterly, Journal of Politics, DuBois Review, Journal of Women, Politics and Policy, Politics & Religion and several other journals. Dr. Gershon co-edited (with Nadia Brown) Distinct Identities: Minority Women in U.S. Politics (Routledge Press 2016). Her research has been funded by the National Science Foundation and the C-SPAN Educational Foundation.
