

The Doctor of Nursing Practice (DNP) program integrates nursing science with biophysical, psychosocial, analytical and organizational sciences, which graduates use to understand the nature of health and health care delivery and evaluate the effectiveness of interventions.

In addition to clinical responsibilities, a variety of possible leadership roles exist as a health care provider in administration, education, informatics, public policy and public health.

Why UNCW?

UNCW's unique Doctor of Nursing program offers electives at the graduate level which are specialization-specific and lead to a graduate concentration in:

- nursing education,
- transcultural nursing,
- nurse executive leadership or
- technology and informatics.

UNCW School of Nursing History and Facts

“The DNP program allowed me to grow from treating an individual patient to treating a family within a community and a society. It showed me the importance and influence of advanced practice nurses getting involved in shaping health policy.”
